Throughout its history, Japan has developed a unique sense of space: socially, culturally and aesthetically. While this uniqueness is not identifiable as a singular characteristic, there are aspects and elements observable that constitute the Japanese-ness in cities, architecture, gardens, painting, and literature. This lecture reveals some of those aspects and elements and their interrelationships in the historical as well as contemporary contexts.